Child Care in the Campus Community

Introduction

For parents working at the University, the Penn Women's Center has compiled an informal directory by asking all of the known child care centers in the University neighborhood to fill out a questionnaire. The following pages summarize the responses of twelve centers, and give a checklist of things to look for as you visit and compare. The map on page IV will help you locate the centers.

The Women's Center is not in a position to recommend or guarantee any center, and we urge all parents to investigate thoroughly and select carefully.

The University proper sponsors only one facility—the Penn Children's Center (right) affiliated with the School of Social Work. In addition, the Infant Friendship Center (page II) has an affiliation for teaching purposes with Children's Hospital of Philadelphia.

Though not all centers gave comparable answers on their questionnaires, each did describe its general thrust and its licensing, which indicates substantial compliance with regulations pertaining to health and safety, qualifications of staff, equipment and program content. The Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare (D.P.W.) Bureau of Child Development licenses all facilities which provide child care. In this state a day care center is defined as a facility in which care is provided for seven or more children at any one time, in child care areas not being used as a family residence. The operator must receive authorization from the D.P.W., which inspects, evaluates and licenses these facilities.

The Pennsylvania Department of Education, State Board of Private Academic Schools licenses private schools. Some facilities listed here have dual licensure, including Drexel Early Childhood Center, Little Friends Learning Center and University City Montessori School. In this directory, two parent cooperative nursery schools are not licensed by either agency—St. Mary's Coop Nursery School and Tabernacle Nursery School, where parents provide some of the staffing.

Compiling this type of directory is a rolling process, so any list may be out of date by the time it becomes a reality. The Women's Center will keep updating the file available for examination at our Houston Hall office. Whether you use one of these centers or another form of child care (such as a babysitter in your own home), we would like your response to the brief questionnaire at the end.
